British woman who conquered K-2 says she loves Pakistanis

Murtaza Ali Shah

LONDON: Vanessa O'Brien, the first British woman who conquered K-2 last month, has said the western media has been irresponsible for presenting a distorted image of Pakistan by highlighting stereotypes while ignoring the real beauty and diversity.

O'Brien, 52, conquered the K-2 on 28th July 2017 and made history in her own right - raising flags of both Pakistan and the United Kingdom.

She brought the flag that was hoisted at K-2, the second highest peak in the world, to Pakistan High Commission here yesterday and presented the Pakistani flag to Syed Iqbal Abbas, the High Commission here, at a reception organised in her honour.

By completing the round-trip journey from base camp to summit, Vanessa became the first British woman to conquer K-2, 24 years after Jonathan Pratt became the first British male to do the same in 1993. In her remarks at the High Commission, Vanessa shared the story of her challenging journey to the top of K-2 and spoke about her determination to accomplish the feat.

She fondly narrated how much she was impressed by the people of Pakistan, especially talented youth, their generous hospitality, the pristine beauty of the mountains and landscape of northern areas, and the economic potential of the country.

Addressing Pakistani media here, she said she loved the people of Pakistan more than its mountains and peaks.
